and a Digital Art and Design program engaged 26 students at Liberty High School for Newcomers, a transfer school serving new immigrant students as well as those who require English language acquisition, in learning graphic design skills with a social justice focus. Youth were also engaged via community-based organizations, such as the Queens Community Justice Center's alternative-to-placement program. Culminating events for all programs were conducted in person, with the exception of character design, which was celebrated via Zoom with attendees from across the country and around the globe, as well as at the respective CTE schools. In all cases, YAs publicly presented their process and finished work to a wide array stakeholders, including elected and city agency officials, community members, family, and friends. After meaningful interactions with each other and numerous creative professionals, our YAs were empowered by the skills they learned, their personal and professional development, the enduring accomplishment of their artwork, and its positive impact on the community.

Feedback from partners emphasized the value of tactile, hands-on art-making experiences for youth recuperating from the ongoing effects of isolation from the pandemic and the turn to digital connection. Programs were further tailored to enhance school engagement and attendance, outcomes for English Language Learners, and to represent community identity—for example, upon registering that several schools' attendees included numerous recent arrivals, an Art Around the World lesson plans were expanded to include additional representative artists and projects. Students exhibited and celebrated their work during culminating events with an invited audience of peers, teachers, family, and CAW staff.
